Most of the junior high school students in Taiwan are busier and busier than before. Every day, we have a mountain of homework to finish before going to bed. After we come back from school, we still cannot take a break. There are more and more cram schools near our schools. Most of my classmates need to go to the cram schools every night. Although we study a lot after school, our parents still hope us to do more.

Besides, parents often think that being a doctor is much more successful than being a worker. I just don't understand. If there are no workers in the world, then how will we have houses to live in? And who are we able to call for help if our cars are broken?

As a teenager, I know I have so much to learn. However, I am just curious about the answers of all the parents. When they were young, did they really want to become a dentist more than to become a soldier? Or isn't being a singer more interesting than being a teacher for them?

Travis: Stanly, how's your trip to the UK?

In Netherlands, cars are not common on streets. Riding a bike is more popular than driving a car. In Amsterdam, 40% to 60% of people travel in the city by bikes. There are also many canals in the city. Surprisingly, people find 15,000 bikes in canals every year. Getting bikes from the canals in Amsterdam is even a job! Waternet, a company in charge of cleaning the canals, finds people to fish the bikes every day from 1960.

Throwing things into the canals has a long history. Before, there was no sewer system in the city, so the canals were like trash cans to receive things in. In 1860, Amsterdam started to face the problem and began cleaning the canals, but people didn't stop throwing things into them. When people are drunk, they might have a higher chance to throw bikes into the canals.

The weather also makes the bikes end up in the canals. When it rains heavily, water in the canals moves toward streets and carries the bikes away. Don't forget to see bike fishing when you visit Amsterdam.
